

In the parched village lived the girl Lehua and her pet piglet named Ehu.

Each morning before the kahuna started their chants Lehua and Ehu would go down to the seashore. There by the rocks and tide pools they would look for the 'opihi shellfish and the reddish-purple hā'uke'uke urchin.

When she had filled her special woven basket with shellfish and returned to the village Lehua always shared the food with her neighbors.

The villagers had come to depend on the girl's generosity for their survival. They waited eagerly for her to return each day.
